

A preface.

As an undergraduate at the University of Indonesia I am always looking out for opportunities that will allow me to gain knowledge beyond four-walled classrooms. My pursuit of a Public Administration degree have somewhat hindered my progress to reach certain life goals. Not that I regret my decision to pursue this degree, I just held rather different expectations prior to starting school. I started looking for ways to play up to my own expectations and that may very well explain why I am always on the lookout for an answer to the question 'how can I move closer to my goal?'

I would be loath to look back in five years time and decide that the investment I made by going to school isn't worthwhile. These days I've heard many say earning an advanced degree was a wasted effort and that it wasn't enough to secure them jobs. I'd like to think that those people relegated to only studying. Only studying and not learning won't sustain you in life after university. I personally see this internship as a way to integrate all the knowledge I gain from classroom learning to complement and enhance what skills I have already acquired.

The resume that I have attached will show you that I'm adamant in broadening my horizons and expanding my interests. I think trying new things will invigorate and refresh one's mind to bring new ideas and new energy to the community around them. I was raised in a foreign country therefore I've come to value challenges from an early age. I believe I am most suitable to work in a dynamic environment. Additionally, I take pleasure in poring over articles. I can take complicated information and present it in an easy-to-understand, upbeat format. I function well in high pressure situations and pride myself in completing my tasks before a deadline without compromising attention to detail and quality. I also adapt marvelously to new, foreign surroundings.
